CONCLUSIONS

1. Diversity is good; it is an expression of the natural and cultural wealth that makes up our world.

2. Respect for identities is fundamental in the building of peace.

3. Confronted with closed and petrified identities defined by opposition, it is necessary to vindicate the concept of porous and permeable identities, capable of interacting with others and developing and growing through the relationship.

4. Beyond the legitimate loyalties and memberships, every human being’s inherent dignity must be respected as a value in itself.
