CONCLUSIONS

Cohesive Societies: Social Structures, Justice and Vulnerable Groups

We affirm the reality of structural violence at different levels:

- In the financial and economic arena
- In the political world
- In culture
- In the distribution of natural resources

And as a consequence we must reconsider structures:

- From the pain of the victims
- With a discernment of what is just and unjust
- From a perspective that is not just representative but also participatory, to promote structures that don’t dominate but serve the common good, having the capacity to recognise their errors and correct them.

It is appropriate that we empower people in this political process through our involvement, institutionalising this participation through social movements with a positive attitude in order that we challenge any structural violence that we see.
